It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

WANDERER

OŔ,

Surprizing Escape.

HEN I first read the pamphlet, which had such a prodigious run, under the title of Ascanius, it was in a very cursory manner, having before been tired with almost, daily accounts of the young adventurer's travels and hardships, after the battle of Culloden.

Though

Though I could not but be affected by the rapidity with which he proceeded, at his first fetting out; yet, when I found all his hopes blasted by a total defeat, which put an end to my alarms, I must acknowledge, notwithstanding I am well known to be a zealous friend to the prefent happy establishment, that I both admired and pitied the unfortunate youth, nay, wished him fafe on the continent, as did many others, who would be among the foremost to prevent his It was with indignation I observed the news-writers affronting a brave and generous people, by thinking low and fcurrilous invectives against the person of the wanderer, was a method to gain their favour. I don't know what effect this might have on the dregs of the people, but I am a witness, that such papers have been treated, with visible contempt, by many of those gallant officers, who contributed to his entire overthrow.

I fay, I ran over the pamphlet carelest eficust, looking upon it as calculated to get a penny, without any other view; and thought it, by the turgid Aile, the performance of a certain female author, till I had gone through the whole; but then, as I found it contained no fmutt, I altered my opinion, and throwing it aside, aside, troubled my head about neither the work, nor the author, till I read in the news. that the bookseller of it was taken up. This awakened my curiofity to give it a fecond, and more attentive reading, to discover what there was in it could possibly give the government offence: but this, I own, was more than I could do; for, on the contrary, if vilifying the unfortunate youth, deserves a reward, he has a juster claim to it than the most scurrilous of the news-writers. I am really apt to think, the bookseller informed against himself, that he might be taken up, as all the public papers would, by that method, advertise his work for nothing; which, by raising people's curlofity, might carry off another edition: and, that a warrant was granted, on the strength of that information, without examining the pamphlet; which is a very wretched, inconfiftent composition.

I was fpeaking of it to a gentleman) who was of my opinion, and he attributed the success it had to the title Ascanius. I think the author might with greater propriety, have given his adventurer the name of Beller sphonies, considering the small succour the Franch gave him. It is possible they did not design his destruction as Iobates did that of the prince of Ephysia.

B 2 which

which, however, when I reflect how far forward that nation looks, I should be loth to swear; but it is certain, they sent him to encounter as great dangers, and, I believe, were little concerned what became of him, as their views never extend beyond their own interests: wherefore we may more properly apply to him the proverb, and say,

Bellerophontis literas attulisset, rallel, from what we have learnt of that Trojan prince, whose name he has given him. They are not alike in any one particular, as I remember, and consequently he has been guilty of an absurdity in the choice of his name. But let us examine the unlucky stumble at the threshold, a little closely. Ascanius was the only son of Eneas,

Omnis in Ascanio cari stat cura parentis, and Eneas was a Trojan prince, who is faid to have betrayed his country to the Gracians, tho' Virgil, who deduces the origin of the Romans from these (at best) fugitive Trojans, gives him a character answerable to the vanity of his own nation.

Arma

Arma amens capio, nec sat rationis in armis:

8ed glomerare manum bello, et concurrere in arcem,

Cum sociis, ardent animi, suror iraque mentem

Præcipitant, pulchrumque mori succurrit in armis.

Our author's young adventurer is not the only fon of his father; and this latter, far from being a traitor, when exil'd, or permitted, in reward of his treachery, to leave his country, was driven out of it, long before he had the use of reason, while, consequently, he was incapable of doing good or harm. Thus far there is a wide difference.

Again, Ascanius followed his father, who was feeking out a settlement for him: The young adventurer, on the contrary, is himself at the head of his party endeavouring to regain a settlement for his father. The one might slatter himself with a happy issue, after his father's foretold long and irksome wanderings;

Longa tibi exilia et vastummaris æquor arandum, as he had a promise from heaven; but the other had but little reason to hope the same from the bona side of France, of which experience

convinced him. The one had no hereditary claim to what he obtained, and the other has been taught to believe he had, to what he endeavoured to recover. But this is sufficient to prove the author made a very injudicious choice in that of his adventurer's name, This is not the only mistake even in his title page, in which he tells us, his True biftory is a translation from a manuscript, privately banded about at the court of Versailles. I would fain know a reason for this caution. However terrible our messengers may be to poor grumbling fcriblers, I am apt to think that the court of Versailles is under no apprehensions of danger from these worthy gentlemen. It is ridiculous to imagine, they who formed and supported the diversion here, should be thus upon their guard in a narrative of its miscarriage, when, I am fully persuaded, they never intended it should have any other iffue; and therefore none at the court, from any fear of offence to the king or ministry of France, would be cautious of publishing a miscarriage which they must have foreseen. But these errors may be more readily passed by than the choice of his motto, which must necessarily give offence to a christian, who will be apt to think it little short of blasphemy. But to proceed to the work itself.

The author sets out with a florid commonplace soliloque; after which he prudently precautions his readers not to be over-curious in their enquiries; and tells them, in heroics, from whence he derives his commission, by whose authority he takes upon him the mournful task, and how he learnt the sad particulars, are secrets, which time only, or some event yet hid in ber dark womb (that is, I suppose, the dark womb of some event) will reveal, but he may not. The stile is indeed captivating: it is in the true modern sublime of romance, which it is well known soars to the higher pitch, as it is less clogged with sense or grammar.

Though I must admire the quaint diction of this author, yet I cannot entirely depend on his veracity, when he tells us, that he presents his readers with the naked truth, undisquised by the least garment borrowed from the plenteous wardrobe of sistion. I am apt indeed to believe, if the truth is naked, that she is not cloathed or disquised with any garment; and possibly I may not be the only one of his readers, who are of the same opinion: But the question is, whether he presents us truth, and nothing but the truth. This I shall endeavour to discover in a very short examination of his work:

work: If he does, we must allow he has the gift of intuition; since he can tell us, that Ascanius felt in bis mind a true presage of bis entire deseat; and he must admit, that he himself was either an ear-witness of their consultations, and other discourses among the rebels; that he has since corresponded with them in a very particular manner, since he repeats their very words, or that he took a step to the plenteous wardrobe of sittion, to borrow a garment to cover the lady's nakedness. I shall transcribe the beginning of the first paragraph of his narrative part.

When Ascanius (during the battle which he lost near Inverness, in the highlands of Scotland, April 16, 1746) faw his men beginning to retreat before an enemy they had hitherto vanquished with surprising ease and facility, (these synonyma have a surprising beauty) he instantly selt in his mind a true presage of his entire deseat, with all that train of borrors, destruction, and slaughter, that ensued; yet he kept the field, till he saw that all was irrecoverably lost. His post was in a corps de reserve behind the main body, which he quitted not till his horse had been killed under him, and himself wounded in the hinder parts by a carabine shot."

As no body has yet been taken into custody for vilifying the unfortunate tool of France, I dere fay this paragraph gave the g____t no offence; though I think the describing him, as the author does, an errant coward, who kept at as great a distance from danger as he possibly could, is derogating from that honour which our brave and victorous duke that day acquired. Gentlemen, who were in the battle, are far from giving this wanderer so undeserved a character, and will tell you the Scots attacked with a fury near allied to madness; the wasderer's horse was show and his groom killed by him as he mounted another, where the fight was horrest, and not when he fled and gave his purfuers an opportunity to wound him in his binder parts; a circumitance, I fear, the author herrowed from the plenteous wardrobe of fiction; fince by the ftrictest enquiry, I cannot find any who ever heard it; and, in his own account, by taking no farther notice of this imaginary wound, either by its being dreffed, occasioning him any pain, or proving an impediment in his skulking, but on the contrary speaking him an ladmirable foot-man, he gives us ground to think it an invention of his own. reads this paragraph must, however storid, think think it somewhat like stabbing under the pretence of an embrace. 'Tis visible he takes this for art, but it is also as apparent he has no pretence to it; he might have shewn more, had he gone no farther than infinuating that the wanderer. was not in any danger, till all was lost by the words during the battle, but durst not complement his readers with penetration enough to discover his drift, and therefore is particular, that we may not mistake his design. He has above given usthe wanderer's thoughts; it would have been satisfactory to his readers, had he told us, what ground he had to prefage that train of borrors, destruction, and saughter, which. if we may judge of men by their actions, never had a place in his thoughts. No matter, the words are fonorous, lofty, and depreciating the character of the undone wanderer, whose fears fet before his eyes the most shocking scene of blood and desolation, as in other places he makes them give wings to his flight.

This idea he would give of the person whose wanderings he pretends to particularize, is another proof of his having very judiciously given him the name of Ascanius; and these forebodings of his young adventurer, whose reputation he is anxious to destroy, are very inconsistent fiftent with what he makes him afterwards fay of the D---, and with his hardly being perfuaded of their being verified; but confistency, we may observe, is below the notice of so elegant a penman; for after having, more than once, shewn his young adventurer a poor, dispirited, irrefolute, timid creature, he afterwards makes him resolute, undaunted, and the only one unmov'd by the dangers of an impending from, which he describes in such a pompous stile, that it approaches very near to what the French understand by their Phabus, and we call bombast. He recovers himself, however, and allows him to act the hero but a little while: he fings this minute, while death stares him in the face, and he is overjoyed when the king of terrors, by his getting fafe ashore, is withdrawn to a greater distance: this scene of joy is soon after changed, and the hero we find weeping like a child, and in such a desponding condition. that in hopes of faving his life, (which also was childish) he is for surrendring himself-But he has not yet flung dirt enough. To crown the character of his adventurer, he makes him undutifully reflect on that of his father, and valuing himself as a man of superior fortitude.

If this author, or our news-writers, think to make their court to the gallant officers of the army, by telling them, as they have often represented the Scots and their chief, that they had to deal with a rabble only of old men and boys, the refuse of jails, headed by a poor timid animal, they have certainly a very absurd way of judging. Inever heard that any body reap'd, honour by beating a coward: and if before the deseat of the rebels, they thought such a character would animate our troops, they betrayed a mean opinion of their courage.

The truth is, the young adventurer behaved very different from the manner this writer makes him; far from being sadly dispirited, faint, in confusion, irresolute, and with tears in his eyes; he is allowed, by his enemies, to have shewn great presence of mind and resolution, both in, and after the battle; and this is evident from the accounts of the hardships he went through, specified in the public papers that he could never have supported under them, had he been the poor desponding wretch the author of Ascanius makes him. The Seots behaved like Scots, i. e, with great bravery; and the English like Engith, i. e. with still greater. The Duke, by the disposition disposition of his army, shewed himself, young as he is, a great captain, and he being, as I may say, prodigal of life, by exposing himself wherever the danger was greatest, was such an example, as would inspire a coward with resolution: and, I believe, so far contributed to the gaining the victory, that possibly, under any other general, if at all gained, it had not been equally complete and decisive.

A person who was in the battle, and an eyewitness of his Royal Highness's behaviour, asfured me, that no common foldier in his army was more exposed, and that he saw part of the Duke's hat carried away by a common-ball. The fame gentleman had before been taken by the rebels, and gave me the following character of their chief, viz. That he was better than fix foot high; as strait as a pike, as round as an egg: and that he would run, leap, and fight, with any man in the highlands. That he did all that lay in his power to prevent the havock made by his followers, which heartily griev'd him, but that he wanted authority to restrain them, and his mildest admonitions were answered by menaces to desert him. My author, who is a man of veracity, was himself plundered, and almost ruined by the rebels, who laid laid hold on this opportunity to fatiate their revenge on fuch, as they had before deem'd their enemies; and as no one subject in the three kingdoms is more zealous for the present establishment, and sew were more serviceable, during the time of the rebellion, we may be allowed to give him credit.

Whether the enterprize of this wanderer was as rash as we once deemed it, since his secretary has become an informer, begins now to be doubted; but this I think must be allowed. that the prospect of success was far from being alluring enough to engage a coward to enter upon it, as fear is a great magnifier of danger. No impartial man will deny the Scots the character of a brave people, as it must betray great ignorance; and yet I am of opinion, had that whole nation united in the support of this wanderer's pretentions, which was very far from the case; nay, had he, farther, had promises of assistance from England, yet had he been the pufillanimous creature he has been reprefented, he would never have made the attempt he did, which had a very fensible effect on public credit. He would have objected his father's former baffled hopes; the improbability of Scotland making a conquest of England, and the the much greater likelihood of that antient kingdom being reduced to a province in revenge of the attempt. He would have treated all hopes built on the promifes of the fickle English as chimerical, and shewn the impossibility of their being performed, (however fincerethey might be) by the government securing all whom they might have reason to suspect in his interest. He would have argued from the aversion of the nation to popery; from their fears of ruin by a wet spunge; from the power the government was invested with, and the difference between a raw, and a well-disciplin'd army, supported with a large train of artillery, with every other necessary, well paid, well fed. well cloathed, befriended, at least in appearance, by the country, and which, if defeated, would with ease and speed be recruited; and, an army, fatigued with long marches, in want of every thing, in an enemy's country, which, if once routed, their scattered remains must be cut to pieces by the peafants; nay, by even those whom they might have reason to think wished them well, but who would facrifice them to their own fasety: and the very persons from whom they hoped to find fuccour and affiftance. might, to remove suspicions, in effect, prove the more bloody enemy of the two.

Thefe

These obstacles to the least hopes of fuccefs, his fears would have fuggefted, on the supposition he could safely land, which no doubt, they would have made appear an infuperable difficulty, and an attempt which must call his prudence in question, considering the number of English ships, as well men of war as privateers: but supposing he should have the good fortune to land, how, upon the ill fucceit of his affairs, could a retreat be secured? and what he might expect, should he fall into the hands of his enemies, by whom he was already attainted, he could not but foresee. pretend to have been of the wanderer's council. or to know what he thought, though the author of Ascanius could tell us what his mind presaged; but it is natural to believe, from what we have feen, that he apprehended none of these dangers; and, with a greater appearance of reafon, we might conclude, that his pushing, with a handful of men, into the heart of the kingdom, that he was rather to be taxed with temerity, than want of courage, did not his retreat speak a cool and regular conduct? But indeed we can make no true judgment of this step of the wanderer, as we are ignorant of the motives which prevail'd on him to make it, notwithstanding the opposition he might reasonably have expected from marshal Wade's army, which, had he defeated, supposing the best, must have occasioned the loss of a great part of his own: but the badness of the weather, and the hardiness of his highlanders, removing that obstacle; he met with no molestation from those troops:

Whoever is just enough to speak of an enemy divested of prejudice, will allow virtues confpicuous to the impartial; consider the birth of, and the notions in which this gentleman was brought up, and putting himself in his case, will be far from vilifying him for an attempt to recover a right he has been taught to believe indefeafible: nay, he will be apt; though an enemy to his pretentions, to rank him in the number of bold men; which I am fure is doing more honour to the victorious Duke, than the contrary method taken by the stupid and fawiling daily scribblers. I remember to have heard. that af er the battle of Hochstet, marshal Tallard telling the duke of Marlborough, that he had defeated the bravest troops in Europe, his grace answered, he must allow it, if his excellency would except those which beat them. We may be enemies to a cause, without per-D fonal fonal pique to those who support it; and tho we abhor the principles, yet it speaks a meanness of spirit to detract from the characters, nay, even to conceal the virtues, of our enemies. None will fay the earl of Clarendon did not detest those of the Usurper, yet he mentions him as a very great man: the prince of Conde was the enemy of king William, but notwithstanding, acknowledged he deserved the crown he had obtained. Edward III. of England admired, and publickly rewarded, the bravery of a French gentleman, with whom he fought hand to hand, who twice struck him down upon his knees, but whom the king at last took prisoner. This generosity seems inherent in the brave: and hardly has there been any great man distinguished for his courage, but he has admired the same virtue in his enemy: whereas the contrary is the characteristic of a groveling But allowing this wanderer as much ever man perfonal bravery as had, will any way strengthen his pretensions? that Will it have any effect on the act of fuccession? Will it influence men of fortune so much as to make them risque their lives and estates to support his claim? Will it be a barrier to guard our liberties, or, rather would it not endanger them? Will it secure our religion and property?

property? Will it make him less a papist? Will it remove our just fears of popery? Or, lastly, will it absolve us from our oaths of allegiance?

Let us then allow him a virtue, which in justice we cannot, and in policy we ought not, to deny him. He has nothing but his fword for his fortune: his reputation as a brave man, may get him employment in the armies of foreign princes, and, fuch as may fatisfy his ambition; however, it may give him too much business to leave him time to think of making any farther attempts on these kingdoms, of the vanity of which he has reason to be convinced; but if the character given him here of a pufillanimous, poor, irrefolute creature, should meet with credit abroad, it is certain no prince would accept the tender of his fervice, and his whole thoughts would be bent upon giving them disturbance, who had deprived him of bread; and though his future enterprizes should, as it is a thousand to one they would, meet with as little fuccess, yet they may, possibly, cost the lives of many brave men, he would always be the ready tool of our enemies, and fuch will doubtless be as ready to give him hopes, though it is certain, they will always drop him him, whenever their own interest requires

Further, as this nation, it is to be feared. will never be without factious turbulent spirits, who hope their peculiar advantages in public broils, fuch will always keep him in their eye; nay, even a wicked ministry (and we are not fure we shall be always bless'd with such wise and upright patriots as now are at the helm of government) may, underhand, flatter his hopes, either to awe a future fovereign by hinting that there is a strong party to support a different claim, or to draw weak men into such rebellious practices as they know they can crush at pleasure, and thus feather their own nests with the down of fools; whereas if he is in the fervice of some foreign prince, the only way he and his brother can hope for support, it is probable, from their father's repeated, and the wanderer's late difappointment, they may look upon all proposals of being settled here, as ridiculous, and have more wit than to let go the substance to catch at a shadow.

But I shall proceed to fulfil what I have promifed in my title page; but for an unanswerable reason, I shall not undertake to acquaint acquaint my readers with other peoples thoughts, of which, from their actions, I suppose them as able to judge as I can be; neither must they expect to be entertained with such private conversation, as it would be apparently ridiculous for me to pretend to a knowledge of; nay, I won't take upon me to vouch the truth of my informations, or to answer for the veracity of my informers, as I pretend not to penetrate into the secret thoughts of the heart: I shall only say, I believe them men of probity, and can discover no reason for their imposing on my credulity: but yet I may be deceived.

At the first breaking out of the present war between us and France, the late invasion of Scotland was not only projected, but proposed to, and rejected by, the wanderer's father with indignation, as he was fully persuaded the Franch never intended his service, and as fully resolved to be no more the dupe of their policy. The emissaries of France endeavoured to soften him, by many arguments, which were never repeated to me; but I have heard that they endeavoured, by some of them, to prove his and the interests of France were become so entirely one and the same, that by deserting his, they could not not but very greatly be wanting to their own. They laid before him the state of Europe in general, and defired him to confider the face of affairs in Great Britain and Ireland in particular: that England was loaden with heavy debts, which must, by the continuance of the war, become intolerable: that the people were divided into factions, and that there was always subsisting a party zealous for his interest: that a majority of the Scots were naturally attached to his house, who would be joined by numbers averse to the union, which, crammed down their throats by bribery and power, had reduced them, in a great measure, to a province, and it was therefore their interest to break thro', and recover their independancy: that in Ireland the ancient families had been trampled under foot by the English, to whom they, especially ·fuch as had not politically conformed to the protestant religion, were little (if at all) better than the flaves in America: that the Roman catholics there were a confiderable body, and he might expect a powerful affiftance from men. who hoped to recover, not only their liberty, but their estates, and to obtain a free exercise of their religion.

He heard them with great coolness, though with a feeming furprize, that they should be so little acquainted with the English in general, and the weakness and timidity of those among them, who were most loud in his fayour, whom experience had always shewn to be vox et pretærea nibil; nay, that even these were so averse to the Roman catholic religion. and so jealous of their liberty, that if he was to appear with a necessary foreign power, they would throw their weight into the opposite scale; and if he had not a considerable body of troops, they would doubt his being able to protect them, and, if the government permitted them, fland neuter. He gave them to understand, that what they had advanced, made against what they proposed; that the heavy debts the English were involved in, was an infuperable obstacle to his ever turning his thoughts towards England; that a majority of the Scots being attached to his house, was a notorious mistake; but, was the kingdom so, it would avail him little; and that he should be very weak to hope affiftance from the Irifh, in the fituation they had described them, as oppression was known to break the spirits, and introduce a total degeneracy in a nation; and, as they were without chiefs, without arms, and, in his opinion, without the thought of endeavouring to better their condition, which they feem (and reasonably) to think the attempt would infallibly render much worse. No doubt, the French were in the same way of thinking; but beside their immediate views, they possibly had an eye to recruiting their Irish troops by stirring up a rebellion in that kingdom. However, they found the chevalier immoveably sixt in the resolution, not to sacrifice his friends to, by being again the tool of, French politics.

After repeated attacks on this quarter, without the least success, they turned their thoughts to the son, hoping to work on the ambition of a young man: the father had none to move him, and seemed to direct his thoughts to the securing a reward in another world, for his sufferings in this; but, to their great disappointment, they found him no less phlegmatic, which they, however stattered themselves was owing to his entire submission to the will of his father, and a respectful deference to his superior judgment, than whom, he had infinuated, sew better knew the interests of Europe, or the affairs of Great Britain. This character has been given him by some who had an opportunity; and were well able, to make a judgment; and if he has a just claim to it, it is nothing wonderful, considering the experience he has had, his advanced age, and the school in which he was brought up. As this young gentleman, it is said, never lets his countenance betray the real sentiments of his heart, I have been told, these emissaries received an impression of him, which was as far from being in his favour, as it was wide from the character his generous enemies allow he merits, and they wished he had more of his brother's vivacity.

A diversion in any of the three kingdoms being of the last consequence to their affairs, as it probably would recall from, or prevent sending the English to, Flanders, than which troops they fear none more, this second illusion of their hopes did not make them so far despair, as to give them quite over. They took all opportunities to learn the true character of this young gentleman, both from Italians and others, with whom he seemed to be conversant. From a reservedness in his nature, he is said to be intimate with sew, if any, and with none so far as to let them into his secrets, excepting such as there is a necessity of communicating. The many disappointments his father has met, makes him extremely upon his guard; though, possibly his speaking little and that only on common topics, may rather be attributed to his having, if any, but small hopes of affairs taking a turn in favour of his house, than to policy. If I am rightly informed, he is far from being of a sanguine temper, consequently less easy to be amused with, or give into, airy projects. With regard to the fair sex, his behaviour in Scotland plainly evinces, that he either is not so sensible of their power, as we have been told he is, or has a great command over his passions; for on the strictest enquiry, I cannot find he gave the least grounds for resections on any lady there.

As impenetrable and as cautious as he is said to be, there is one passion of the mind that the wisdom of a Selomon cannot conceal: love will shew itself; it will suffer no disguise. They whose business it was to read the young wanderer, consequently watched his very look, found him who appeared indifferent to the glittering of a diadem was not so to the sparkling eyes of the fair; but when they imagined they had discovered this secret, they were at a loss, for some time, by his equal deportment, to determine which of the beautie of Rome had the greatest lower o'er his heart.

As the French emissaries had planted spies sipon him, who watched every step he took, notwithstanding his often illuding their vigilance, he was one night feen to come out of a private door of the garden at Albano, and, at a distance, followed to the house of Rosalinda. The spies could not, however notwithstanding they furrounded the house, discover his return to the palace, where they next morning were, and payed him their respects at his levee. They after this took more exact notice of his entertaining that lady; but, by even long obfervation, they could not perceive, that, by any one particular, he diftinguished her from others who frequented the court. Against, this lady? who was beautiful, gay, ambitious, young, and had the character of more ready wit than folid sense, they resolved to plant their batteries. Though they were doubtful whether they had a right clew, yet they hoped the being foon fatisfied whether they had or not. One of them had the address and good fortune to discover. by a spice of vanity in her composition, from which few of her fex is free, that the interest of the wanderer was not indifferent to her, and that she thought herself honoured with his confidence. Having succeeded in this attempt they were encouraged to hope an happy iffue to their negotiation: the person (monsieur Centdouble) who was to attack her foibles, was in a declining age, artful, penetrating, fubtile, witty, and well read both in books and men. methods he took to engage the lady to their interests, I know not, tho' from the character given her, they are not difficult to divine. Possibly the prospect (though distant) of an imperial crown for her lover, and the coronet of a dutches for herself, might blind her to those difficulties which the clearer-fighted chevalier could not over-look, and even to the dangers to which her dear wanderer must inevitably be exposed: but whatever was the prevailing motive, she gave entirely into their (at least feeming) way of thinking, that if the offered opportunity (which could not fail of fuccess) was loft, it would be vain to hope another.

opportunity of displaying all my little eloquence, in amusing my readers with the particulars of the several discourses with which these supposed lovers entertained themselves on this subject; but neither my inclinations have any bent that way, neither, had they, would my title page permit me to gratify them. All that I farther know, is, that foon after our wanderer was observed to take less notice of Rosalinda; that she was feen less frequently at court, and, in a little time, made a tour to Venice, as it was reported. From which circumstances we may reasonably fuppose, the wanderer was less a warm lover, than a wary politician; and the views of the emissaries were again bassled, by their having mistaken the real character of the youth, who has a furprising command of his passion. even thought, that if that court had not taken more effectual means, such was the chevalier's resentment of the treatment he had received from, and his diffidence of, the French, he could never have been prevailed upon to suffer his fon to go in fearch of adventures: but France getting the court of Madrid to guarantee her fincerity, that she should punctually perform whatever engagements she entered into; procuring at the same time, by her agents promiling mountains, invitations for the chevalier or his fon, to enter Britain, and his Catholic majesty promising the necessary supplies of money, to which we may add, the follicitation, of the fon, (who, 'tis thought, wants not a laudable ambition) his prudence was at length overcome, and he, with reluctance, gave his confent to an enterprize, which, he publickly faid even when his friends at Rome congratulated him on his fon's being possessed of the metropoli of Scotland, he apprehended it would be fatal in its confequences. An Italian nobleman faying to him, when the news of C----'s defeat arrived, that he could not doubt success crowning the attempt; he coldly answered, nor should I, sir, were my son at the head of an army of immortals; but to me, it is evident. that every victory is a step advanced to ruin. as none can be obtained without a lois, which gannot be repaired; for let us suppose France really defirous to support him, it is morally impossible she can throw in sufficient recruits till the has a naval power to cope with the English which I must own, I should hear with regret. Some in the circle, for this was in public, mensioned the probability, or rather certainty, of this victory encouraging his friends, who had not yet declared, both in Scotland and England, to throw off the mask, and publickly affert his cause; in answer to which, he only shook his head. But to return.

With whatever secrecy this enterprize was endeavoured to be entered upon, it was soon whispered at Rome, that some great design was on the carpet for the service of the chevalier; and the minute of his sons setting out, the road he took, nay the stages he travelled, were minutely known to the court of England, and possibly possibly his route before he entered upon it. By what means, however men may guess, the secrecy of the government is such, none will presume to say with certainty. Hephesion cannot be accused of having betrayed the secret, as his being consulted was objected to by cardinal Sturbature.

To pais by what may be found very particufarly related in our news, I mean the journey of our wanderer. At his arrival in Paris, he, that very night, was privately visited by G T--- who staid with him better than two hours. The next morning, before day, he waswith great secrecy, conducted to a private apartment at court, where the king met and received him in the tenderest and most engaging manner, as he himself assured his friends. What there passed between them, as C-- T-- was the only witness, who never gave me any account of it, as the young knight-errant never divulged it, and I have not yet heard that the king of France has made it public, my reader will excuse, if I do not particularize, But this came to my knowledge, that to the wanderer's great furprize and concern, Rosalinda threw herself in his way, when he was at the duke of R---'s house He immediately knew her, though in ' men's men's cloaths; and, it is believed, he made hera false confidence, as she was soon after seen, and visited in London, by ladies, to whom she ex pressed herself in terms, which shewed a refentment of the treatment she had met with. But this, notwithstanding, she is, by many of the wanderer's friends, believed incapable of what fome others of them have infinuated. one hand, her conduct is not altogether justifiable; fo, on the other, it is well known, no fet of men was ever more suspicious of one another. and what feems paradoxical, lefs gifted with fecrecy: and to go one step farther in their character, to shew how little dangerous they are to, or rather how contemptible they must be in the eyes of all, government, they are lions over a bottle, but at the mention of danger, the shaggy main drops off, and the fleece appears; the airy castles vanish, and frightful ideas of jails and halters are substituted by their fears. But I digress too far.

Our wanderer had been but few days in Paris, where he held frequent confultations with some of the French ministers, and the Spanish' ambassador, before Manilia was introduced to his presence by Agehimensis, to whom she had brought letters of recommendation, from perfore ons in England, on his judgment and integrity he could rely. This lady was pretty well advanced in years, but she has the remains of a once beautiful face, her shape was still fine, she was tall, upright, and flender; her air commanded respect, and spoke her what she is, a woman of birth: her judgment is folid, and though she speaks but little, she fays much, always pertinently; and delivers her fentiments with fuch remarkable modelty, that she seems diffident of that fende, which many of her fex, with a degree lefs, would be vain, and possibly with little cenfure. In a word, fet aside the bigotry in her principles, which she sucked in with her milk, the most professed enemy to them could find nothing to object to her character. She was received by the young wanderer with marks of diffinction, and having delivered her credentials, she defired a private audience; after which Manilia was always called to the council's held while the wanderer had any of his confidants with him. She was in Scotland the Maintenon of the disaffected, who took nor a step without her previous opinion; her arguments and irreproachable life, (if we except rebellious practices, which the fatally miltook for loyalty) which gave a weight to her reasonings, spread the defection among the ladies, many of whom had power F power enough over their husbands to taint their loyalty; her masculine courage, and the considence she reposed in that of her countrymen, possibly made her look upon the desolation contequential of rebellion, which her good fenfe could not but foresee, as, at most, a bare possibility, and might (as she was a bigoted facobite) imagine the justice of the cause, such as would engage heaven in its defence, and then infallible fuccess would not only secure her country from waste, but, by plenty succeeding to poverty, it would become a land flowing with milk and honey. I say this might probably be her way of thinking, as most of that party are great. eastle-builders. However, this lady was the only one they durst confide in to send to the wanderer. If she was in high esteem in her own country, she was not less admired by the friends of that party abroad, among whom her genius commanded an uncommon attention, is faid, that the wanderer's embarking with fo few followers, as the only method to elude the vigilance of the English ministry, was by her advice; affuring them at the same time, that the clans were in readiness to take arms, in a number sufficient to defend him, on his appearance.

The lady having executed the commission she had undertaken, left Paris with as much privacy, as she had entered, and, for a small space, continued in it, rewarded with a rich jewel, which the French king sent her by C--- T—, and gave her friends in Scotland a satisfactory account of her negociations, of which I have no certain particulars.

When every thing was adjusted relating to the subsequent rebellion, at least every thing that France thought conducive to her views, the young wanderer fet out in the habit of an Abbé, and on Saturday the 3d of July, 1745, embarked on board the Dutilly, at the mouth of the Loire, a frigate of eighteen carriage, and eighteen swivel guns, commanded by captain Durbé, and belonging to Mr. Welch. On the 4th he anchored at Bel-Isle, where he continued till the 15th, waiting for the Elizabeth, a ship of war of fixty guns, and fix hundred men. commanded by captain d'O, and under her convoy he left that place with a fair wind at two in the morning. The wind continued fair the 16th and 17th. The 18th it blew very hard; and, on the 19th, it was a dead calm. On the 20th the Elizabeth fell in with, and at-F 2 tacked, tacked, the Lyon, an English man of war. The engagement began at fix in the evening, and lasted, with great fury on both sides, till ten at night, that is, as long as they had any light. The frigate, on board of which was our wanderer, received no damage, except half a dozen musket-balls through her main sail. Mr. Welch, the only person on board to whom the youth was then known, would on no account, (apprehensive for his fafety) suffer her to engage. The Elizabeth was very roughly handled, not only in her masts, fails, and rigging, but also in her hull, into which she received so many shot, that they were obliged to make the best of their way for Brest, which they almost despaired of reaching, she made so much water. Captain d'O was killed, and the Elizabeth had three hundred men killed and wounded. The frigate, thus deprived of her convoy, continued however her course. On the 22d she was chased, and made a clear ship to engage, but got off. The following three days they were again chased by different ships, but had the heels of them. The 26th and 27th they had a terrible storm. It was fine weather the three following days; but on the 31st, about midnight, there arose such a violent storm, that the whole ship's crew gave themselves up for loft, lost: However, they weather'd it; and on the 1st of August, it being a dead calm, they sounded and found ground at a hundred and eight fathom. On the 2^d they made a small island, near the coast of Ireland, called Bernera. On the 3^d they arrived at the isles adjacent, and anchored at Bara, being chased; but the wind chopping about, and in the teeth of the pursuers, they escaped that threatening danger.

Here the wanderer, and the gentlemen who attended him, went on shore, to stretch their legs, but on their return, on the 4th, theyagain set sail about ten at night, and favoured. by the shades of the mountains, keeping close: along shore, they passed through several cruizers, with no small hazard, and great silence, with a pressed sail, coasting the isle of Sky, On the 5th they passed the list of Run, and came to an anchor on Lochabar in Scotland; but the same day weighed again, and went higher up the coast, and got into a fort of a cove, where, sheltered from the fight of their enemies, by the favour of fome rocks, they began at night to unload, and got all out on the 15th. On the 16th, all being on shore, our wandererlay at Barasdale, where his palace was a wretched hovel; his bed, grass; his diet, cheese; butzer, and oat-cakes; his drink, water; their wine being all spent. Here he was joined by fifty men. It was here also, and not before, that the ship's company knew whom they had carried. The wanderer gave the crew a hundred pistoles, and staid here till the 23^d, and then going on board again, they set sail for Kenloch Moydart, about twenty-sive miles distant, where he staid till the 28th, and was joined by about one hundred and sifty more.

The 29th of August they left this place, and passed Lough-Shield to Glensiarich, where they lay that night; and from thence they continued their march to a small village called Glenfien, where four hundred highlanders joined them. They proceeded on without bread, of which they had none for the space of three days, directing their course towards Castle-Blair in Athol; and on the 3d of September were joined by five hundred, on the 6th with fifty, on the 8th with one hundred; at Garrie-Moor, the oth, with one hundred and fifty; on the 10th they came to Dalnacardich, and on the 11th arrived at Blair in Athol, a castle belonging to the duke of that name; where the wanderer found the first refreshment, after having had a long fatiguing, hungry, hard journey, often in want of bread, and lying on fern.

He staid here till the 14th, when he went to Dunkeld, a castle belonging to the duke of Aztbol. On the 15th he marched to Perth, eighteen miles further, where he staid till the 22th; when he went, and dined at the castle of Tullibardine, a houe be longing to lord George Murray. The 23th the wanderer went to Creef, where, on the 24th, he parted with the marquiss of Tullibardine, who returned to Dunkeld, and he went forward towards Edinburgh. The country of Athol surnished about three thousand men to the wanderer; the rest of the army was made up by the pretended duke of Perth, Macdonald's, Camerons, and others.

In this journey they met two small parties, of whom some sew were killed by the wanderer's van-guard, and the rest taken prisoners; and before they reached Dalnacardich, in the mountain of Dirmochlir, between Riven of Badenach and Dalnacardich, (where there is a fort, which was vainly attacked by the highlanders, and stoutly defended by six soldiers, assisted by their wives.) They were within three quarters of a mile of the king's forces, under the command mand of g—1 C——, at the head of 1900 men, who came to meet the wanderer; but he having greatly the advantage of the ground, the general wanting provision, and, in case of a defeat, having no possibility of saving the remainder of his army, it was thought, in a court-martial, that the attacking him was injudiciously hazarding the king's forces.

G-1 C- marched fifteen miles to Ri. ven of Badenoch; from thence twenty-fix Scotch miles to Inverness, all the way through the difaffected part of the country, where he staid some days, and called a council of war, whether he should return back the same way to Stirling, or proceed from Inverness to Leith, by fea or land, to meet the rebels who made long marches towards Edinburgh, as he was informed: but transports sufficient not being to be got, he marched to Nairn, fifteen Scotch miles: from thence to the town Forres, and so to Elgin, eight miles farther, the capital of the county of Morro: from thence he marched fix miles to the river Spey; and from thence twelve miles to Cullen a bine; after that he had fixteen miles to the town of Bamff, capital of the shire of the same name; thence he marched to Petre-bead, thirty mile distant, in the county of Buchan; then then twenty-four miles to Aberdeen; all the way on the coast of the sea. At Aberdeen he got transports; waited some days for a fair wind, and at last set sail for Leith, or East Lothian: at length, long expected by the loyalists, he arrived at Dunbar, within sixteen miles of Prestonpans, where the battle was fought; whither he directed his march with the greatest expedition, and in it was joined by some hundreds of the country Seceders; but gave arms neither to them, nor to any others who also joined them that were lest, when the battle was fought, with the baggage, he searing their not being disciplined, they might occasion a consusion in his army.

While the g——I was at Inverness, he was joined by captain Monroe, of Culcairn in Ross. fbire, brother to sir Robert Monroe of Foulls, with all the clan of the Monroes, who accompanied him to Aberdeen, where the g——I sent most of them back to keep the country quiet.

As a French manuscript, which accident threw in my way, has thus far guided me in what related to the wanderer, I must observe, that the dates are hitherro N. S. and that it being written by one belonging to the nominal duke of Athol, he leaves the wanderer at Perib. where he staid a week, saying only, that he proceeded to Edinburgh, and in the way law ar the house of lord Kilmarnoch: and that a detachment of about fix hundred horse or dra goons, fent in order to observe the rebels, at their approach, retired, and they entered Edinburgh without opposition. But this latter, as the writer gives it on hear-fav only, was not fatisfactory enough, I therefore endeavoured to be particularly informed of his march to that metropolis; and with some difficulty. and a good deal of diligence, got notes, which inform us, that the 12th of September. the wanderer, who had dined at Tullibardine castle, belonging to lord George Murray, went to Crief and the pretended duke of Athol returned to Dunkeld

On the 13th, the wanderer marched with his army towards Blackford, at the entrance of Sheriff-moor, where his father was defeated in the year 1715. One party of the rebels striking off to the right, in order to secure the fords, six miles above Stirling, sinding it possible to cross at that town, general Blakeney having broken the bridge *, secured all the boats on the contrary side, and placed a body of near four hundred dragoons, and some soot on the banks of the river, the general having been alarmed by the other party, which went strait over the Moor; till they came within sight of Stirling, and on the top of a mountain made fires in the night: however, this was a stratagem, to amuse and deceive the king's forces (these being only a small party) till the greater body had secured and crossed the fords without opposition, as the king's dragoons, &c. imagined the small body in sight the whole sorce of the rebels, and that they would attempt crossing in the night, at, or below, the town.

The main body having thus croffed the river, headed by the wanderer, marched within two miles of Stirling, to the town of St. Stringens; the church of which town they blew up, to prevent their magazines falling into the duke's hands, when he pursued them, after their return from England.

The king's dragoons, and the garrison of the castle, finding the rebels had given them the slip, and had in the night encamped at the said town, colonel Gardiner, who commanded the beforementioned dragoons, made the best of his way to get between them and Edinburgh; which he did, and entered Falkirk.

The castle, while they were encamped, as above, which was within reach of the cannon, kept a brisk and continual fire upon them the whole night, but did no execution. The following day the small body, or party, was lest to amuse the garrison, having now none to oppose them, the dragoons being gone, and the soot retired into the garrison, joined the wanderer; who the next morning with his whole forces, to the number of three thousand and sive hundred rebels, some armed, some naked, (though even in this condition they struck the people with a very great pannic) marched to the right of Edinburgh road, near the town of Killyth, within nine miles of Glasgow.

Here for a while we will leave the rebels, and turn our eyes to view this city, which had kept spies night and day (well mounted) between that and Stirling, which are eighteen miles distant, that they might have particular information of every motion of the rebels, expecting a visit from them, as it was unwalled and very opulent; wherefore they armed several hundred men to keep guard day and night, night, both within and without the city, for which they were under terrible apprehensions: and believing Edinburgh in no manner of danger, the magistrates applied to general Guest for some thousand stands of arms, but met with a refusal, that capital being under no less (if not a greater terror than the city of Glasgow, knowing a considerable number among them disaffected to the present government.

The citizens of Glasgow finding the rebels, in a manner, at their shop doors, called in all their out-guards, and held a council; the result of which was that the magistrates and clergy should leave the city, as they had but two thou-fand stands of arms, most of them out of order, and were discouraged by general Guest's refusal, as above, notwithstanding they had men enough.

In consequence of this resolution, they continued removing their families and effects (which their fears had put them upon doing at the first news of the rebels being at Perth) to Dunbarton castle, to that of Edinburgh, and to other places in the adjacent country.

The clergy having fled, and the magistrates intending to follow their example, about 13000 of the inhabitants stopped them, demanding the arms of the town to be delivered into their hands, that they might rather die like men in defence of their wives, children, and effects, than tamely see the first ravished, the second murdered, and the third plundered; expecting nothing less, if they themselves escaped being butchered in cold blood, frrom the frightful idea they had conceived of the rebels.

The magistrates endeavoured to dispel their fears, however great were their own, telling them, that colonel Gardiner being so near, who had promised to come to their assistance with his dragoons in case the rebels entered the city, would keep them in some awe, and prevent their doing any great mischies; that therefore they ought to be quiet, and make no shew of resistance to defend the city, which would be vain to hope they could do, till those troops were in sight to support them; whereas did they of themselves offer to make a stand, it would only enrage a desperate rabble, who would not value what havock they made, and occasion the very desolation they hoped to prevent. But indeed.

Colonel Gardiner having reconnoitred, and found he was no way able to cope with, them, made the best of his way for Edinburgh, where he was to be joined by colonel Hamilton's 400 dragoons, which had been for a considerable time encamped in and about that capital. Colonel Gardiner coming to the village of Casterphon, within two miles of Edinburgh, on a Saturday evening, was next morning joined by these troops, in order to cover that capital.

The fears of Glasgow were dissipated by the rebels directing their march from Kilsyth towards Edinburgh. In a village on the sea coast below Falkirk, they found several casks of powder and some swivel guns, belonging to merchant-men, with which they made free, and marched on to Linlithgow, where they made a stay of two or three days. Here they held a council, and it was resolved to proceed and attack Gardiner and Hamilton's dragoons, who were encamped (as I have said) at Casterphon, supported (and bravely as we shall find) by some thousands of militia, and the city-guard. In which were the best of Edinburgh, and many of the clergy, determined to wait for, and give, the highlanders battle, on their first appearance.

In the city the inhabitants held a council, the result of which was, to call in the militia to guard that, and leave only the city-guards with the regular troops.

On the fight of the rebels colonel Gardiner (who offered the city to leave a party of his dragoons in it) hearing at that very inflant of general Cope's arrival from Aberdeen at Dunbar; twenty-four miles from Edinburgh, made the best of his way thither: and the city guards plucking up a courage, bravely marched into the town, with more precipitation than was confistent with the expectations they had raised by the gallant resolution they had declared of defending it to the last man, when they marched out to encamp.

Certain persons of distinction came from the city to, and had an audience of, the wanderer: what was their errand, or whether fear or affection was the motive for this visit, I shall not take upon me to determine; bur It was thought by his people; that it was the former, and that they came to make some terms for the city; into which let us now cast an eye.

The city-guard being got in, without the loss of a single man; and Gardiner, with Hamilton's dragoons, having left the defence of this capital to the bravery of the citizens, intent on their own fafety only, occasioned a confternation among the inhabitants, not inferior to that which feized them a few days before, when the fire (or alarm) bells were rung, and the people possessed with a notion, that they ·should be massacred by the wild highlanders while they were at divine fervice on the fabbath; at which time the ministers preached girded with their fwords, being most of them commissioned officers of the militia. The univerfal terror was at that time fo great, and the outcries and horrors of the people were fuch, till they were informed, that the rebels were yet at some distance, that it is impossible, by any words, to give a just idea of them.

The city-guard being (as I faid) retired into the city, the gates were immediately thut; and the citizens, having before raised double sconces within the walls, and planted cannon not only on them, but in the main streets fronting the gates, determined to defend themselves to the last drop of blood. A general council was held of magistrates, clergy, and trades; in which there arose great debates, little differing from tumults. At length the question was put, Whether it was expedient to defend or furrender the city; on which the major part concluded to defend it to the last extremities: and accordingly every man took to his post. Soon after this resolution taken, a letter (sent by the -wanderer) was delivered to the magistrates, requiring them: quietly to furrender the city under pain of military execution, which if they did, they should continue unmolested, or to that purport. This occasioned the holding another council, but less numerous, the magistrates and clergy being only affembled, with fome few heads of the trades, to whom the faid letter was read; when after many arguments, the question was put, Submit or not? The one half of the magistrates and the clergy voted for defending themselves; but the provost, and those with him, apprehending the difmal confequence if forced to furrender to fuch a desperate fet of men, were for opening the gates, and carried it by two votes.

The general panic with which the whole city was struck, made them think their fafety depended on the despair of any; for the common people were become desperate, from their apprehenesions of falling into the power of a popish pretender: on any terms whatever, as they had been taught that the papifts think themselves bound by no ties, however facred? to perform their promises to protestants: it was' therefore judged expedient to conceal this last resolution from the populace. Thus the walls continu'd man'd, and the town-guard under arms, ignorant of the determination of the council; in consequence of which determination, the provoft took his coach, and privately (between' twelve and one at night) went out at the nether port, and rounding the outlide of the walls," drove to the rebels camp at Casterphon; from whence he returned before day-break, apprehending the fury of the mob. had his tour been discovered. What passed between him and the rebels. I defire to be excused from relating; till Fam informed of it myfelf. But,

However secret this resolution of surrendering was endeavoured to be concealed, yet it' was divulged, at least suspected; for many gentlemen, tlemen, and others, who were on duty, crying out, the provost had sold the city to the rebels, ran up to the castle, delivered their small-arms to general Guest, and desired a party from him to remove the cannon from the city thither, to prevent their falling into the hands of the rebels; which the General dissuaded them from as dangerous to themselves, should the rebels sall upon them while they were so busied.

·However, though the city-guards continued ftill in their posts, the inhabitants removed the cash-banks of the city, all the records, and their valuable effects, into the castle, where many of the clergy and others took shelter.

Lockiel marched that night with his men, a body of about fix or feven hundred, in order to furprize Edinburgh. He concealed them, and in the morning, at the opening the Nether-bow-port, they rushed in, furprized the city-guard, proclaimed the father of our wanderer, and sent him an account of what had passed; who, on this intelligence, set forward, entered the city by a breach the citizens had made to fire through, and took possession of Holy-rood-bouse.

As foon as the rebels got into the town, they possessed themselves of the guard-house, disarmed the guards, and made themselves masters of all the cannon in the town, and had not a party from the castle in the night, before they entered, carried off Gardiner's and Hamilton's baggage, they had seized a valuable booty, as there were about a thousand tents, of which they were in great want: about twelve the wanderer's father was proclaimed * * * *, and he him-self * * *

I find in the French MSS. journal this article, Le premire d'Ostobre le p— envoyat un exprès au Duc qu'il etoit arrivé a Edinbourg capitale d'Ecosse est que la ville etoit illuminée par tout sinon le fort qui n' etoit pas rendu.

On the 1st of October, N. S. the p-fent an express to the duke (meaning the person taking on him the title of duke of Atbol) of his arrival at Edinburgh, capital of Scotland, and of the town being throughout illuminated, except the castle, which was not surrounded.

If the wanderer judged of the people's inclinations by this instance, a little time convinced him him, that these rejoycings are no certain marks' of affection, nor the least dependance to be found ed on them.

The wanderer staid at the palace till he had intelligence of G-1C-'s march, and then went out to give him the meeting. He left Edinburgh, and that night lay at Trenent, fix miles diffant, where he refolved to attack his majesty's forces, who were so very advantageoufly posted, that upon reconnoitring the ground, it was deemed impracticable to make any effort on that side, without a manifest hazard of being entirely defeated; wherefore the rebel army marched a little to the eastward of Trenent, lay upon their arms that night, and began the onfer at break of day next morning, when they' fushed upon the royalarmy with such surprizing and sudden fury, that after the first discharge of the cannon, they got possession of them; the G-P's dragoons gave their fire, and (as my account fays) trufted their safety to the seels of their horses. The particulars of this battle, called the battle of Prestan-pans, being allowed to be justly set down in our publick papers, Ishall passthem over, and only observe, that of the tebels not above a dozen were killed outright; but most of their wounded men dying.

the greater number that very night, their loss amounted to about fourfcore.

After the defeat of his majesty's forces, the wanderer marched back to Mussleburgh, and lay that night at Pinkey house, and the next day returned to the palace at Edinburgh, where tents and other necessaries, were provided for his army, which encamped at Didistone, all the while he sojourned in that capital.

The rebels having defeated the royal army, Locbiel, at the head of his people, entered the Nether-how-part of the city, with the colours they had taken from G—l G—, about nine in the morning.

A little before they entered the city, fix of the king's dragoons had ridden into it as fall as their horses could carry them, to take shelter in the castle, into which they were received: as they rode thro' the streets, the inhabitants asked who had gained the battle? They answered, the king. This salse account occasioned the losing several others, either killed or taken; for a number of highlanders, besides Lochiel's party being got into the town a little after Lochiel's arrival, were dispersed into different houses houses for refreshment, when a large party of the king's dragoons coming in, to get also to the castle, the highlanders fired upon them out of the windows, which fire they returned; and this alarming the castle, General Guest, acquainted with the loss of the battle, refused to receive them, fearing the rebels, elate with victory, might rush in with them, and seize upon it.

The next day (as I have already faid) the wanderer returned to Holyrood-bouse, and his father was again proclaimed at the city cross, this second time with great formality, the king's heralds being compelled to perform the ceremony. After which they were obliged to read a manifesto, which promised much more than the Scots believed would be made good. The same day was issued a proclamation, commanding all within the city, and twelve miles round, who had any arms, to bring and deliver them at Holyrood bouse, and all who had any horses of his majesty's diagoons, to fend them to the camp of Didistone, under pain of military execution.

The next day another proclamation was read at the public cross, by which all who had taken ken arms, clergy or others, were declared rebels, if in so many days they did not make their submission; which occasioned all the clergy to desert the city, and was the true reason of divine service being suspended during the time it was possessed by the rebels.

The same day they took possession of the custom-house of Leith, in which were seizures to the value (as said) is of forty thousand pounds sterling, which they sold to the smugglers, from whom they had been taken and to no one else at a third part of the known value.

In the interim, the castle every night was casting shells at Holyrood-house, out of cochorns and mortars, but did no harm.

The day after they had feized the customhouse, the rebels opened the trench, and raised batteries against the castle; the fire was very hot on both sides, for some time, in the night only, especially from the rebels, who had placed guards at all the avenues leading to the castle.

A proclamation was ifflied a few days after the trench was opened, for the citizens to withdraw the cash, or money banks from the castle, and carry on their business as usual; but this being disregarded, another immediately followed, forbidding the furnishing the castle with provision on pain of death. In answer to which, general Guest gave the citizens to understand, that he would lay the town in ashes to clear a passage for the receiving supplies, and advised them to provide for their personal safety by the next morning.

This occasioned the chief of the city to apply to the wanderer, to take a proper method toprevent the threatned ruin. He wrote to the governor of the castle, which letter being already printed in the publick papers, I take no notice of. In a word, a truce was concluded: for eight days; during which time, the calle was fuffered to receive provisions from the city and country; which space being elapsed, the fire began on both fides with greater fury day and night. Many houses nearest the castle were beat down, many of the inhabitants killed (whowould not take warning given as beforementioned by the general) and many more fled the city. Though the high street of Edinburgh is much more crowded with people than any street in London, yet by 12 o'clock, after the cafile ftle began again to fire, not a foul was to be feen in it. At length the fire from the castle set the weigh-house (standing in the heart of the town) in a slame, by which several rebels, and many of the inhabitants, lost their lives.

The rebels having erected a battery against the north west side of the castle, near Mr. Neal Mac Vickar's church, who made the remarkable prayer taken notice of in our papers, fixed from thence, and were answered by the guns of the castle, which beat down a house, in which was captain Taylor, a shoemaker, who had promised to present the wanderer with the keys of the castle, and several rebels; many of whom were killed, and those who escaped (among whom was the faid Taylor) were taken by a party of the garrison, who flung themselves down with ropes and with the same hoisted up their prifoners. Thus the captain took possession of this fortress, tho' he could not find the keys to make good his promise.

The weigh-house being, as it is said, burnt; the fire from the castle and that from the rebels continuing day and night, the citizens, apprehending the entire demolition of their metropolis, left the city; and slying for safety to Leith, met for shelter to Edinburgh; for the rebels being in possession of Leith, the Fox man of war, (which was afterwards lost with every soul on board) fired furiously upon that town, so that the poor distracted citizens and townsmen knew not where to find refuge.

On the north east side, where the rebels had opened a trench, the garrison sallied out, and made a great slaughter; and, without returning to the castle, entrenched themselves in the night, and sallying again, from thence the next morning, killed many more of the rebels.

The fiege may be faid to have lasted about twenty days; tho' the batteries on the rebels fide were sooned filenced: the castle, however, continued the fire till they quitted the city.

I shall now return to my French journal, which says, Le 3 (Octobre) N.S. le Duc a reçeu une lettre du p—, qu'il avoit été victorieux d'une battaille; qu'il y avoit cinq cents hommes de suéz, et trois brigades de prisoniers. Le p—— a perdu environ une douzaine de soldats. October the 3^d, N.S. the duke (meaning as before) has received a letter from the p—— of his having

The 7th ditto the duke (as before) continued, at the castle of Dunkeld till the 25th, in which time he received all the warlike stores, and four thousand Lous-d'ers for the p——, from on board a ship arrived from France.

The 28th he fet out from Dunkeld for Perth, about fifteen miles distant; where, on the 29th, he received another supply of warlike stores from on board a French ship. There are other (triffing) particulars, no way interesting or material; wherefore I shall only observe that this nominal duke joined the wanderer at Edinburgh, on the 10th of November, N. S. where on advice of the arrival of some ships at Montrose with cannon, money, and warlike stores, a party was sent out to guard the pass at Alleaway. Two of his majesty's frigates were in the Firth, with some transports which landed fix or seven hundred men on the north fide, to prevent the passing of the cannon: a battery was raised by the rebels of six pieces of cannon, which the king's ships battered some time time in hopes to demolish it; but they having received considerable damage from the battery, were obliged to withdraw, and hearing the highlanders were advancing in a large body, the king's troops reimbarked, and the rebels carried off their stores, money, a great quantity of small arms, and cannon, which were six in number, without further interruption.

It was remarked, that the wanderer, all the time he was at Edinburgh, was extreme sedate and full of thought, and not in the least elated by his victory at Preston-pans; which may possibly be from his natural disposition, the care he was in, or from the business he had on his hands, being greatly taken up with writing, as will appear in the sequel. It was once hinted to him, that some ladies seemed desirous of a ball? to which he answered, it was a very improper season to think of diversions.

There is a ftory which I shall take notice of, though not vouch for its being other than pure invention.

Notwithstanding as strict a discipline was said to be kept as possible, among such a number of wild men) it was next to impossible to restrain them from committing some disorders:

many private piques were revenged under enlour of a public cause; and no vigilance could prevent some of the highlanders from marauding. Half a dozen of them had one night gor into the house of Mr. ---, near Kerntouloch fix miles from Edinburgh, a very mortified gentleman, remarkable for his great charity. piety, and abstemious life, who lay every night in his winding-sheet and coffin: the highlanders having fecured what arms were in the house, set 2 centinel over the fervants, and packed up all the plate and linnen they thought they could carry off. The chamber where Mr --- lay, was without furniture, and the last they visited as they were going off; (having locked the fervants in a room:) feeing the coffin they concluded 2 corpse was inclosed, and as it might have a good winding-sheet, would be a pity to leave it behind them; they therefore, with a delign of taking what the dead man would never mifs, removed the lid of the coffin, on which Mr. - raising himself up, they were struck with fuch a panic, thinking the Deel had taken possession of the corpse, that they all took to their heels, and Mr. - running after them to the door, at their rushing out, fastened it upon them; though the precaution was needless, for they never looked behind them, or flackened their pace, till out of fight of the house

But to retutn: On the arrival of the nominal duke of Atbol at Edinburgh a council of war was held, and after some debate, it was refolved to march for England. Accordingly they fet out, and went to Dalkeith, where they staid fome few days. Having advice that a detachment of Wade's dragoons were drawing near the borders, they fent out parties to gain intelligence, and resolved to divide the rebel army into two bodies; one of which was to march towards Peebles, and the other towards Kelfor, to conceal their real defign. Not being able to gain any intelligence, one body made a ffay of fome days at Kelsoe, and then marched to Judborough, on their way to Carlifle, and joined the other body at Longtown, and then proceeded in one corps, refolving to beliege that town; but hearing that G— W— was coming by Hexam, towards Brampton, with design to give them battle, the wanderer gave orders for the" rebel army to march towards Brampton, and sent out parties towards Hartwiftle, to gain intelligence of the king's army, but receiving none, he, with a part of the rebels, staid at Brampton, resolved, (if G-1W-came up) to give him battle, and the other part he fent to invest Carlille, which (some days after the trenches were opened) furrendered, as did the castle the day following. The wanderer here rested his troops some days; after which, (leaving agarrison in Carlisle) he, resolving the push. forward, as Wade did not appear, marched to Penrith; from thence to Kendal, by Schap; and at Lancaster made a stand of two days. Some of the foot marched to Garfton, and again joined the main body the next day at When they came to Manchester, they were joined by about seventy of that town and neighbourhood; a convincing proof, that what hopes they had of the country's rifing in their favour, were raised on a very sandy foundation. Here the rebels refted two days, and lord George Murray went to Congleton with a party of horse and foot, (we may suppose) to encourage a rifing: if it was with fuch a defign, it is a demonstration, that neither the wanderer, nor he knew the English Jacobites. No people in the universe know better the difference between drinking and fighting: it is true the latter they know not practically; and we may believe they are so well satisfied of the truth of what they - have by relation, that they never will. toasting healths reduce kingdoms, and the French K monarch monarch had a body of these men in his service, he would bid fair for succeeding in the favourite scheme of universal monarchy.

Some of this party lord George Murray detached to gain intelligence of the king's forces, and heard they were at Newcastle-under-line. In their return to Congleton, they carried with them captain Vare, whom they took in their way, and detained him till they left Carlifle in their retreat to Scotland. This party staid a day at Congleton, and then marched thro' Leek, over the moors, to Afaborn in the Peak, where they joined the wanderer, and the day after marched to Derby, where they flaid but two days only. As they apprehended (with very good reason) to be furrounded by the king's forces, and had received advice that lord John Drummond was landed at Montrose with some troops, cannon, and warlike stores, from France, a council of war was held, in which it was resolved to return back. The Hazard floop was taken by these recruits landed at Montrose: the tide being out, and she not having water to get off, they raised a battery, and obliged her to furrender. was, in itself, a trifling loss to the government, but of great consequence to the rebels.

In consequence of the above resolution, the third day after their arrival at Derby, they left that place, and made one day's stay at Preston, and two at Lancaster, where they proposed to make a stand. To this end they fent out a party of horse and foot, to reconnoitre, or get intelligence of the king's forces. These met a detachment G-l O-s rangers; but as they had a mortal aversion to the fight of a rebel, they returned the way they came as fast as their horses could carry them: some of them quitted their steeds, and crept thro' hedges to get out of the way by the enclosures: four had the mortification to fall into the hands of these rebels, who were dishonest enough to carry off the horses of such as had dismounted for the above reason.

Though (as I have faid) the rebels defigned to make a stand at Lancaster, yet on better confideration, they thought sit to continue their retreat, as they apprehended the king's forces would get between them and Scotland, the confequence of which need not be mentioned: the wanderer, therefore, marched his army to Kendal, and from thence to Penrith; at the former, the lord George Murray was left with 300 K. 2 men, men, to bring up the baggage to the latter, march of three days; during which, they often faw fome of the king's horse hovering; and sixty or seventy of these having got before the rebels, between Schap and Penrith, had these horse thrown down the stone walls on either side the road. the rebels must infallibly have abandoned their baggage; but this party, at the appearance of the highlanders, dispersed, tho, they coasted the rebel army (at a distance) till they got to Clifton. the baggage was fent to Penrith, and a defign formed to furprize the light horse: to which end, their Hussars where left at a farmer's at the foot of Glifton-moor; the foot convoy with baggage, and some horse from Penrith, marched through the lord Lonfdale's parks to get behind the light horse, who were expected to come into the moor. At Lowther house two men rushed out on norseback, who were pursued and taken, one proved to be a footman of the Duke of Cumberland's; from whom they learned, that his royal highness, the night before, was within four miles; upon which information, an aid de camp was sent to Penrith to acquaint the wanderer. He immediately ordered some foot to fuccour lord George Murray, who returned to Clifton, and posted himself in the most advanrageous manner. Soon after they faw the Duke formforming on the top of Clifton-moor. His royal highness ordered a body of dragoons to dismount, and attack the posts lord George Murray was in possession of, which they regularly did, with great resolution; and being received with equal courage, (if that may be allowed a rebel) a very smart fire, from both sides, continued for some time; but the rebels having greatly the advantage of situation, and about threescore (say they, forty, the other) of the king's dragoons being killed, they were obliged to retire.

Lord George Murray leaving a guard at the bridge of Penrith, retired with the rest of the men into the town. The next day having drawn off the guard at the bridge, the rebel army marched to Carlifle, where they made a stay of two days; and then leaving, in that town, their cannon, three excepted, and baggages (with a garrison of about 200 men, under the command of Hamilton and Townley, the former governor of the castle, the latter governor of the town) the rest of the rebel army having croffed the river E/k, (without the loss of one man) feparated, and by different roads for advantage of forage, marched to Glafgow; where having remained eight days, just twice four longer than they were welcomethey they directed their march towards Stirling. The wanderer went to Banochbourn, and lord George Murray to Falkirk; where he continued on account of the siege of the castle of Stirling, which the rebels vainly hoped to reduce by force: while lord George lay at Falkirk, he from thence made an excursion to Linlithgew, and there seized upon, and carried off the magazines and provisions gotten together for the use of his majesty's troops, which entered that town the evening of the very day lord George was retired with his plunder to join the rest of the rebel army at Banochbourn. Here they remained till lord John Drummond had croffed the Firth with his troops, and reinforced them. On his arrival, a council of war was held, in which it was resolved to give General Hawley battle: for the Duke having reduced Carlifle, left his majesty's forces under Hawley's command, and returned to London.

In consequence of this result, having left a party to protect their works from being demolished by the garrison of Stirling castle, (the siege of which was still continued) they marched and attacked General Hawley, whom they deseated on the moor of Falkirk.

This battle, however it might raise the charecer, it lessened, very much, the number of the wanderer's followers; for the highlanders daily quitted him to return home, and fecure the plunder they had gotten. As the wanderer found all hopes of reducing Stirling castle vain, hisownarmy diminishing, a fresh one of the king's under the command of the duke, who with furprizing expedition was come to Edinburgh, ready to fall upon him, he raised the siege, repassed the Firth, Stirling-bridge being broken down by General Blackeney, before the wanderer formed the fiege, returned northwards, and the night they passed the Firth, reached Dunblain; from whence they marched to Crief, where a council of war being held, it was resolved, for the greater conveniency of the rebel army, that they should divide; the wanderer, with the highlanders, to keep Wade's road to Inverness, (these in their way surprized the Barracks at Badenecb with a party of regular troops) and the horse, with the lowlanders, to march the coast road, under the command of lord George Murray. The wanderer first arrived at Inverness, the place of rendezvous, and took the castle, which made but a few days resistance, and was furrendered before he was joined by the corps under lord George.

After the surrender of this castle, brigadier Stapleton, who commanded the French piquets, marched with some of these, and some high-landers, and invested Fort-Augustus; which surrendred after a seint resistance. During this time, lord John, who was lest to guard the Spey with a proper detachment, in case the king's army advanced, which lay at Aberdeeen, hearing a party of Kingston's light horse, and some Argyleshire men, were sent to Keith, detached a party of his rebels, which surprized, and cut most of them to pieces.

After the furrender of Fort-Augustine brigadier Stapleton, with his piquets, Lochiel's and Cappoch's people formed the fiege of Fort-William; but were obliged to give over their enterprize.

During the siege of this fort, lord Goorge Murray, with the Athol men and Mac-phersons, set out to surprize Castle Blair; and in their march surprized a great number of the Campbells, quartered at Blair-faitey, at Kinkins, and places adjacent; but colonel Agneu, who commanded some regular troops at Blair-castle, retired with them into the house, where for seventeen days days he suffered great straits. The castle was vainly battered with two three-pounders several days, till it was at length relieved by the Hessian troops; on whose approach, lord George Murray, having but a thousand men, their number being about fix thousand, was obliged to retire to Inverness. Here, having advice that lord Loudon Campbell, who commanded the troops which had withdrawn from Inverness, with the Monroes and others who had joined them, were in the shire of Ross, immediately pursued them; but they embarked at Tain, and retired into Sutherland: this put a stop to the pursuit, till boats could be got, which were drawn together with all possible expedition; and the nominal duke of Perth, with some highlanders, embarking crossed the ferry, surprized the earl of Loudon's people, many of whom he made prisoners. but the earl of Loudon and the lord Prefident escaped.

About the same time the Hazard sloop returning from France, was driven on shore by the Sheerness. The money and arms which were got on shore, were surprized by lord Rae's people; and the officers, who came in the Hazard, betrayed by their guide, made prisouers. On which account, lord Cromatry was sent with detachment to chastize that country; bue wanting good intelligence, he was himself surprized, and made prisoner at Dun-Robbin-Castle.

His royal highness having assembled his troops at Aberdeen, and ordered provision-ships to keep on the coast to supply his army, and observe its motion, marched towards the Spey. The rebel army was at this time divided into five different bodies, for the conveniency of subsistence; and as a sufficient number of them could not be gathered together to prevent the Duke's passing the Spey, lord George Drummond's body being too weak to make resistance, he retired towards Inverness.

Advice being received of the Duke's motions, the rebels recalled such of their troops as had been sent to invest Fort-William; the last of which did not arrive at their army, till the eve of the battle of Culloden, whither their main body had marched that night preceding that eve from Inverness, and drew up to receive and give the Duke battle. But his royal highness having halted at Nairn, sourteen miles distant, the rebels resolved to march that night, and attack him in his camp. They accordingly set forward.

ward, but the great distance made it impossible? for them to arrive in due time for a surprize, the Duke's army being under arms to continue their march before day. His transports were the night before gotten into Invertes bay:

Thought the rebels had marched all night, they were four miles thort of Nairn when it wanted but an hour of day, confequently their delign could not be put in execution: wherefore it was refolved to return, and wait for the Duke at Calloden!

On the Duke's advancing, the wanderer accordingly drew out his army on the moor above Culloden-beafer Has royal highness advanced in 3 columns, having formed as they marched. The cannon of the king's army began to cannonade, a diversion the highlanders were not accustomed to, and were therefore eager to come to close fighting, and accordingly, having received orders to attack, they rushed on the king's forces with a fury little short of madness, though the wind was in their faces; which driving the smeak of an incessant hot fire from the king's troups into their eyes, the former were hid from the latter, till they were upon the points of their bayonets. The reason I have already given for passing by the particulars of the two former set battles, may suffice for my not entering into a detail of this, which was attended by a complete victory gained by the duke, and put are, end to all the hopes of the wanderer.

I shall only observe, that after their fruitless march to attack the duke's camp, three thousand of the rebels deferted him. This I have heard charged to the treachery of lord George Murray. I who have all along endeavoured to be impartial, think this charge very inconfistent with his behaviour during this last battle. been told by a gentleman, who was an eye witness of all that passed before this overthrow was. completed, who is a good judge of affairs of this rough nature, and on whose word I dare rely; that lord George, during the action, behaved with the utmost resolution; that the body he commanded made what impression was made. on the king's troops; actually possessed himself of some of their cannon, was the first who attacked, and the last who quitted the field.

Having thus kept the wanderer company into England, returned with him into Scotland, and had him (I may fay) in my eye till he was a entirely ruined, I should now, in compliment to custom, desert him in his abject condition. However, I will bear him company in his adversity, though it is not altogether so modish. But before I enter upon this forlorn situation, I beg leave to return back, and take notice of some particular events, which I purposely postponed, not to break in upon his travels, and which I slatter myself may afford some entertainment to the curious.

While the wanderer was in Edinburgh, the fiege of the castle did not intirely engross his thoughts; he was busied in sending dispatches to the very northwardmost parts of the kingdom, even as far as John-a-Groat's house in the county of Caithness, the people of which, were the first, after his appearance, who had promifed him a powerful affiftance, but hitherto had not fent him a man; not that they forgot him; on the contrary, they were every night drinking his health, and fuccess to his arms: possibly that they might leave none of their liquors to fall into the hands of the king's troops, should they come that length. This fort of demonstration of their loyalty, as they call it, was little agreeable to the wanderer, who faid. There were not braver men than his good friends of Caithness; that nobody proposed to do bim eteaset their duty to his majesty; another branch of this clan, about one hundred and sifty in number, are vassals to the earl of Cromarty, also a Mac-kenzy took up arms under their chief, and his son lord Mac-leed, in favour of the wanderer, as is too well known, for that unhappy family. This nobleman was drawn in by the too powerful persuasions of lord Lovat, and Mac-donnald of Barassale; and though on his way to Perth he repented this rash step, yet, by a wrong notion of honour, having engaged his word, he, however resuctant, proceeded to that city.

A part of the clan of the St. Claires in Caithness, (under St. Claire of Scots-calder, now attainted) also designed to take arms for our wanderer; but were prevented, by lord Loudon's regiment lying in their road. This clan consists of near three hundred men, but the greater part of them well affected to his majesty, and had offered their service to the king, by sir William St. Clair, of Dunbeath in the said county, who came to London solely for that purpose.

The Fragers were all this time in arms, under the command of lord Lovat's fon, but not yet determined on fetting forward for Perth, the place of rendezvous for the northern rebels.

· In the interim lord London arrived from London at Inverness, sent by the government, in a man of war, and to be affifted with the advice and interest of the lord Prefident of Scotland, who, we shall find, did great fervice both to his majesty, and to that northern part of the country, to the no small hazard of his life. He employed himself in writing, and dictating to his clerks, letters to the feveral clans, without intermission night or day, and by his arguments not only determined fome wavering people to remain quiet, but others, before irrefolute, to bring over their clans to his majesty's fervice, among which latter was fir Alexander Macdonnald of the ifles, and the Roffes, beside raising his own people, the Sutberlands, Mackeys, and Guns, whose zeal for the royal fervice was yet more strengthened by his lordship's setting before their eyes their duty to his majesty, and the danger threatening their country, in the strongest point of light; by which means he gathered, to Inverness, a body of between two and three thousand, whom he furnished with money, from his own pocket and credit, for their pay, till the government could remit the fums necessary.

It is also well known, that the lord President by daily expresses, used his utmost endeavours to diffuade lord Lovat from entering on the defperate exterprize he has fince paid for with his head; in the most earnest manner entreating him to fend his men, and join his majesty's forces, the only method by which he could efface the remembrance of his late conduct. In return to these falutary admonitions, the lord Lovat sent a party of the Frasers to his lordship's house at Culloden, which they attacked in the night, but the lord President having fortified it with cannon, and a party both within and without, they were repulfed, lost some men. killed on the spot, and left their wounded, to whom his lordship's charity gave money to be cured, and fent them to Inverness.

The lord Prefident's resolute and prudent conduct, kept up the spirits of all the royal party eighty miles to the south eastward, and as many to the north-east and north-west.

At length the lord Levat, who had lifted the mask, threw it quite off, and sent his men to Perth, which determined lord President and lord Loudon, to send a party of eight hundred men to apprehend, and bring, him prisoner to Inverness, which they performed without loss. He was confined in Mrs. Mac-lean's house, with his own servants to attend him, and centinels placed at the door; where having remained some weeks in confinement, he was at last privately carried off, by some of his own people, to the highlands, where he was concealed till the wanderer returned from England. What more regards this nobleman's conduct, is so well known, that it would be impertinent to relate it.

During this time, fix hundred of the Grants were under arms; but, it was thought, they were for waiting to see on which side the scale would turn, before they declared; wherefore the lord President's letters to their chief (was it so) could have no effect: he was probably resolved to save his estate, whatever side prevailed; for he was as vainly solicited by the wanderer. After the battle of Culloden, however he tendered his service to the Duke, nay, some say sooner, as his royal highness marched from Aberdeen northward, when every one had reason to deem the affairs to the wanderer in a desperate situation.

In the interval, lord Lewis Gordon was very active in spiriting up his his brother, the duke M 2

of Gordon's clan, in favour of the wanderer, and with about fix or eight hundred, whom he had decoyed out of between four and five thousand, of which the clan confifts, being joined by Glenbecket with three hundred men took poffession of, and laid, Aberdeen under contribution, befide obliging them to raise him five hundred men or to pay him 5 l. for each man wanting of that number. Here they proclaimed the wanderer's father *, and the wanderer himself with great folemnity. Provost Meurison, and the aldermen, who kept a constant correspondence with the lord President, sled the city, and ftrongly folicited fuccours from him and the earl of Loudon who fent a detachment of eight hundred men to recover Aberdeen out of the hands of the rebels: but they, in the interim, had quitted that city, to go and meet lord John Drummond, who was landed at Montrofe, with three piquets of the Irish brigade, which made a hundred and fifty men, and lord John's own regiment, which confifted of five hundred men, two hundred more fet out with the unfortunate Ratcliff, but were taken in their passage, so that only fix hundred and fifty arrived, which being joined with lord Lewis Gordon's forces, they amounted to about feventeen or eighteen hundred men; who hearing of the lord Loudon's detachment ment on the road towards Aberdeen, marched with the greatest expedition to get thither before it, which they did while the other were twelve miles short of the city at Invurury, where they intended to lodge all night; and having no intelligence of this forced march of the rebels back from Montrofe, thinking themselves in security, their men were disposed in the neighbouring village and farm-houses, except one company, which staid at Invurury, with captain Monroe of Gulcairn, who commanded the detachment which, the evening before, had passed through Stratbbogie, near which place the fix hundred Grants were under arms, having faithfully promised the lord President to join captain Monros. but they let him fet forward, and, on fecond thoughts, concluded it best to sleep in a whole skin; which they took care to do.

The night eaptain Monroe came to Invurury, where he quartered with one company, they were fallen upon (between eight and nine at night, when it was very dark) by the whole force of the rebels under lord John Drummend, and lord Lewis Gordon.

They immediately affaulted the house, in which were captain Monroe, and some other officers.

officers, some of whom were undressed, and going to bed. Notwithstanding this surprize in the dark, the rebels met with a very resolute. sharp, and obstinate resistance, at this assault = in which, on both sides there fell a hundred men; of this number, some say the loyalists. some again the rebels, lost forty: however it is certain that the captain, the officers, and other men, who were quartered in Invurury, behaved in fo gallant a manner, that the particulars deserve to be recorded in brass, as a monument of Scots bravery, which must strike dumb, and cover with confusion, their calumniators. I am forry I cannot (from the brevity I propose to myself) do them the justice I wish; however, I will do the clans that of letting my readers know they were the Monroes, the Macleads, (of the clan of the laird of the Macleods of the isles, member of the British parliament, which suffered most) and the Rosses.

Captain Monroe and captain Macleod (the chief just mentioned, now in town attending the business of the house) got off; Adam Gordon the younger, of Ardoch, with several other officers and men, were carried prisoners to Aberdeen, and thence removed to Perth.

The two captains above named, who made their way through their enemies with their fwords, endeavoured (next morning) to gather their scattered forces together, join the Grants, and feek the rebels; but they could not affemble a body of above two or three hundred men; the rest, who were dispersed in the other village near Invurury, and the neighbouring farm-houses, had returned, every man to his own home; wherefore they were obliged to retire to the town of Stratbbogie, designing (if joined by the Grants) to march back, and give the rebels battle, notwithstanding the inequality of their numbers: but finding the Grants not willing to engage at fuch odds, captain Monroe returned to Elgin, within fix miles of the river Spey, and about twenty-eight miles from Invurury. Here he refolved to stay for a reinforcement, which he fent for to Inverness, and till he had again affembled those which were difperfed at Invurury, to whose habitations he fent. These not only returned to him, but all the Monroes, who had before staid with their families, now left their homes, on the news of his defeat, and voluntarily joined him, determined to march back to Aberdeen: but the lord President thought it imprudent to risque so brave an officer, at so great a disadvantage; wherefore the brave Monroe receiving dissinstive reasons instead of resolute succours, quartered his men in Elgin, Forres, and Nairn; and would not return to Invernes till his assistance was there wanted.

When the rebels were forced, by the Duke's advancing, to retreat from Stirling to the north, they divided into two bodies, as I have faid in the foregoing itinerary, and a detachment, which made a small body, under the command of Cameron of Lochiel, and Macdonnald of Barasdale, struck off at Crief for Lochaber, in order to raise all the men they could, with the greatest expedition, to meet the wanderer at, and take in, Inverness: The rout of the two larger bodies I have already mentioned.

On the near approach of the rebels to Inverness, the lords Loudon and President were under a necessity of sending to the gallant Monroe of Culcairn for assistance, who immediately slew to succour them; and soon after having had intelligence that the wanderer was at the lady Mackintoss's, in the isle of Moyie, six miles from Inverness, he set out in the night, with a party, to surprize and take him, but had not the success cess he flattered himself with; but returning to the city, affifted in making it tenable, as time and circumstances would permit, strengthening (at the same time) the garrison of the fort, for a vigorous defence: but having received intelligence, that the two bodies of rebels were upon joining, and would make a corps of near eight thousand men, the lords Loudon and Prefident thought proper to retire on the rebels appearing near the city, and leave its defence to the courage and conduct of the governor of the fort, the laird of Grant, who has been fince broke. The prudent lord President, lord Loudon, and their men, were full late to make a safe retreat; for the musket-shot, &c. fell thick among them in croffing the ferry of Kiffack, within a mile of Inverness. I must here obferve the lord President's regard for captain Monroe's merit, for he would not provide for his own safety, till he had (however unwillingly) obliged that brave officer to cross the ferry first to Killmoor, well knowing the inveteracy of the rebels against him and his clan.

The boats at the ferry not being a fufficient number to carry over all the men, the lord Prefident ordered a part of them to take a round of about fix or eight miles, where (near lord Lovat's house) they could ford the river.

The

The retreat was thus made in three bodies, and all got fafe on the other fide the water, defigning to reaffemble, and encamp in the most convenient part of low Rosshire. The last party that forded, went about by the town of Dingwall, and thorough Ferindonald, (the country of the Monroes) and got to New Tarbout, or Milltoun, opposite to the town of Cromarty, where there lay three men of war. two parties came next day to that town, where they met fix or eight hundred of the Sutberlands and Mackeys, but without arms, intending for In_ verness, to assist in the defence of that city. These people had often before required arms of lord Loudon, by their chiefs the earl of Sutberland and lord Rae; but there was no opportunity to furnish them at a time requisite.

The naked men first crossed at Cromarty-ferry, and were followed by lord Loudon's people that night and the next morning, in very stormy weather, and under a reasonable apprehension of the rebels being at their backs. In their passage over they were covered by the men of war, gained the Ross side, and went to the parish of Negg, where they were hospitably received by the minister, Mr. Bulsoubr. Being (hereabout) about) affembled in a body, they found the rebels closely pursuing them, which compelled them to retreat to Tain, the metropolis of Ross, where, after a short consultation, some of them crossed the Muckle ferry, three miles higher than Tain; and others, by a march of twenty-four miles, gained the head of the ferry at Caftle-Nigore, where they croffed the river of Stratboukkell, and all safely arrived in the shire of Sutberland, where they were met by lord President. whom they justly looked upon as their oracle to direct them. Their first precaution was to guard all the passes (from the river to the town of Dornoch) along the fea fide. The nominal duke of Perth, &c. with a detachment of about 2000 rebels were very foon at their heels. A part of these staid at Tain, and others marched towards the head of Muckle ferry, in pursuit of lord Loudon's people, the faid lord having burnt all the boats at Cromarty, and secured all, on the Sutherland fide.

The fituation of the lords, Prefident and Loudon, was here very melancholly; in want of provisions, a party of the rebels pursuing them on the one fide, and the Caithness rebels coming upon them on the other.

The

The nominal duke of Porth, finding it impracticable to reach the loyalifts, wrote to the wanderer, who found means to procure boats from the shire of Murray; but the Firth of that name, and the Sutberland coast being well guarded by captain Middleton, with three of the king's floops, these boats would have been of no use had they not been favoured by a mist, of which they took the opportunity to fend over a party, that landed near the town of Dornoch, and in the night furprized the few men who were with lord Loudon, the greater part being fent (as faid) to guard the passes, the length of thirty miles, nay, even the length of Lough-skin, a fresh water lake, twenty-four miles long.

Lord Loudon's men near Dornoch, after some resistance, were made prisoners, which obliged the others, far and near, to fly to the barren mountains. The rebels, after this success, marched to the Little-ferry, where they seized two ships, richly laden, one with the plate and effects of the inhabitants and merchants, and the other with arms and ammunition, and about 12000 l. of the government's, designed for lord Loudon; but the captain of the ship, by means of a fishing-boat, carried off this money, and lord Sutherland with him, to Cromarty, in quest of the men of war; but being there disappointed, in a mist, put to sea, and meeting his majesty's sloops, saved the cash, lord Sutherland, and himself, from falling into their hands.

Lord Loudon and lord President, after a council held, left a detachment in these mountains. and another in the Mackays country, and with a third marched through the most sterile and mountainous parts of the country, through Affign, Louchbroom, Garloch, and Kintaile, to the north west islands; where in small boats, like canoes, with great hazard, landed in Macdenalds and Macleods friendly country. The hardships they suffered in this march of 100 miles, without bed or bread for a fortnight, may easier be imagined than described. They were not however yet out of danger of the party under Lochiel and Barasdale, sent (as before said) from Crief to Lochabor, after the retreat from Stirling, to raise men.

The lords Loudon and President were (in the islands) joined by the clans, with whom they had taken refuge, but were still under great straits straits for want of necessaries, till the entire defeat of the rebels at Culloden, and for some time after.

In the interval, the fort of Inverness surrendered to the wanderer, and the garrison (the Rosses, &c.) taken prisoners: but his design upon the Speedwell man of war (which lay before the town) miscarried, by the vigilance of captain Middleton, commander of the Shark.

I must now mention the Caithness men, of whom we have given a character in the foregoing pages. The wanderer fending these people a detac ment, some few of them set forward to join Barasdale, who had five hundred men, at Dunrobin; where being joined with the said Barasdale, were attacked by John Mackay, merchant, at Coxtown, with seventeen men, who enraged to see their houses fired, fell upon them, feconded by the women, which giving the alarm to the detachment left in the mountains, they immediately flew to their affiftance: the action grew fo warm, that Barafdale (with about 300 Macgreggers) retreated pretty hastily, leaving the earl of Cromarty and his men, with the Caitbness rebels, many of whom were killed, others drowned, with the earl taken and secured on board a man of war. The -

The other detachment (left by the lords Prefident and Loudon) were not less active and useful, as they were the men who affished to seize the money, and secure the officers which came on board the Hazard sloop, as already said.

The wanderer being in possession of Inverness, and the abjacent countries, sent his prisoners (the Campbells, &c.) to France; favoured by fogs, and at leisure recruited his forces; in which business the lady Mackintosh was very active, (though her husband was then prisoner with the rebels) and acted as an officer of distinction. The wanderer here remained quiet, till he went to meet the Duke on Culloden-moor.

As I was at the expence both of time and labour to get informations, I thought I might fecurely depend upon; and as these were at different times, and from different persons, I could not be so methodical as I wished; and as I would advance nothing of which I had the least doubt, I passed by the behaviour of the rebels at Glasgow, and the particulars of the siege of Stirling-castle. As to the former, I have since found, the accounts given me by an eye-witness, agrees with that in our public papers; and that their visit cost the inhabitants of that city about 30,000 l. sterling, which has given them an aversion (however great the honour, and their own hospitality) to the receiving any more such guests, as their entertainment they think a little too expensive. As to the siege of Stirling-castle, the particulars I got too late to insert, and can therefore only tell my reader in general, that the rebels lost a great number of men, the sloops of war several, (from their batteries) and the garrison not one.

We will now turn our eyes to the wanderer, deprived of all hopes of making another effort, and with small grounds (if any) to escape the vigilance of his pursuers; from whom, especially from the enraged clans, he could expect no mercy.

After so compleat a victory gained by the intrepid Duke, the adventurous wanderer (we may suppose) was convinced of the impossibility of again collecting, or recruiting, the scattered remains of his rebellious army, and were that even feasible, sensible that so terrible and total an overthrow must rather sink than raise their spirits, to a desire of revenging the death had before gained, and now lost; while, on the other hand, the royal army, incensed by the hardships and fatigues of their long chace, with conquest on their swords, would, every man, exert himself to reap fresh lawrels for their glorious chief, and to put an entire end to all their toils. We may therefore rationally conclude, as it was impossible to redress, of even alleviate, the woes he had (by his unhappy enterprize) brought on a people too consident in their own courage, for which, sew nations, if any, (the English excepted) bear a greater character, he turned his whole thoughts on the means of his own safety.

Having (followed by two faithful adherents, Sulluvius and Tyronius) escaped from the battles he found no difficulty to get to the small island Lagabra, and from thence to Carkeuria, where he was received with open arms, and a mixture of grief, joy, fears, by Sempronia, a lady who only wanted loyalty to entitle her to the esteem of all who knew her. She had too good sense not to foresee that the conquerors would be diligent in their search after the undone wanderer, consequently would soon visit this isle, where it was impossible he should escape falling into their hands. No doubt they confulred on? the method the most proper to be taken for his fafety; but whether the fending for Percia; was the lady's own particular thought, or the refult of fuch confultation, or whether the came accidentally on a visit, I know not, neither is it material; it is certain she came to them, and proposed the carrying off the adventurous youth in women's cloaths, as her fervant. This was unanimously agreed to, and instantly, as no time was to be loft, put in practice. The wanderer, with great reluctance, and visible grief parted from his two faithful followers, and under the conduct of Porcia, went on board a smallboat, with one attendant only, and directed his course, favoured by a thick mist which preceded a heavy shower of rain, to Aurea. As they drew near the shore, they heard a volley of shore discharged by those who guarded it, who must have directed their aim by the found of the oars. as they could not discover the boat. They, how. ever, got safe on shore. Porcia left the wanderer and the fervant, and went strait to the house of a loyal gentleman, who was then attending on the British Hercules, but whose lady was infected: to her she imparted the news of the wanderer's arrival, and the place where she had left This account threw her into a fit of despair; despair; she wrung her hands, and told Porcia, that the unhappy youth was irretrievably lost, that she had rashly led him into the very jaws of destruction, and as there were a number of the loyal party in the island, who lest no place unsearched, it was impossible he could avoid being immediately taken. She let her know, that she should look upon herself as accessary to his loss, if she consented to his coming under her root.

A relation of this lady's, of her own unhapby way of thinking, defired she would compose herself, and he would undertake to elude the vigilance of the wanderer's pursuers, and taking with him some refreshments, directed by Porcia, he set out, and soon found him, but with what thoughts he was then amusing himself, I shall not take upon me to fay, but fancy they were different from those which entertained him at his fetting out in fearch of adventures: whatever they were, we must do him this justice, that he endeavoured to stem the tide of his misfortunes with a becoming fortitude. How this gentleman (whose name was Donaldo) made himfelf known to him, as a friend, I cannot take" upon me to relate; neither can I entertain my readers with their discourse, but undoubtedly he' informed him that he was not in a place of fafer ty; for he conducted him from that to his own house, eight miles distant, to which our wanderer travelled (in a manner) bare-footed, the foals of his shoes being (in some places) parted from the upper leathers. Here Donaldo gave him a new pair; and after he had sparingly eaten, (which he had not before done, or had any refreshment in the space of fifty-three hours) he was shewn to a chamber, and after having washed himself from head to foot, went to bed, and flept foundly, till Donaldo (the next morning) came into his room with a labourer's habit, and advising his departure from thence for the island of Tresquilada, where dwelt Mentor, faithful to his interests, conducted him to a boat he had prepared. They parted in a manner (no doubt) fuitable to their fituation.

The wanderer safely arrived at Tresquilada, where he staid three days with the aged Mentor, who judging him in greater safety at Aurea, perfuaded his return thither, where he would find the old Robustus, who had escaped from the battle, and got safe to his home. The wanderer (equipped by him with a wallet, in which he had put some provisions, and a couple of shirts) got to Aurea, and having there sound a guide,

The wanderer was here received with great cordiality; and the old man (after a few days) having prepared every thing necessary, parted with him for the continent, where they met feveral of their friends; but it would have been dangerous for them to continue together, wherefore they dispersed, to provide each for his own fafety. Three of these fell in with a party of the loyalists, and refusing to surrender, on the contrary making a desperate desence, two were killed, and the third (as he fell) faid, you need not feek melonger, you have murdered your p-. He had received many wounds both pistolshot, and from the sword, and lying senseless and without motion, they (from what he faid in falling, and from his fize, age, and refolution) concluded concluded him the wanderer. The report being fpread of his death, it foon flew to London, and in the north made the loyalists more remils in their search.

Some of the rebel party finding these three bodies, and that Curtius: (for so we call him, who was taken for the manderer) had some life in him, they carried him to a hut at some distance; from whence being brought to life, he was conveyed to a place more remote, where such care was taken of him, that he recovered, and got off to France.

It is faid. Curtius and his companions threw themselves purposely in the way of the loyalists, to fall a facrifice to the wanderer's safety. However wrong they were in their principles, if this was so, we must acknowledge the action couragious; and that it is a great pity, that menso prodigal of life, should live in error.

Not long after this, the wanderer (who strayed about the mountains, almost perished with hunger and fatigue) drew towards the seacoast, in hopes of finding some French ships hovering upon it. He met several of his followers drawn thither by the same hopes, which after after three days longing expectation, were gratified; for two ships appeared, and making the known signals, which were answered from the shore, they sent their boats. The wanderer and his friends (in which number was Curtius) lost no time, but immediately embarked, and the wind savouring, safely landed in France.

The wanderer, probably cured of all inclination to the undertaking again fuch perilous adventures, and fatisfied if he had any invitations or promises to induce his entering upon this, from which he so narrowly escaped out of our island, how little confidence he ought repose in them. Nay, if France really defigned he should, and hoped he would, succeed in his enterprize, he ought, by dear-bought experience, to be convinced, how little it is in her power to afford him fuccours; nay farther, that were she in earnest, were all in the interest of his cause armed, and collected in one corps, (which is an abfurdity to think feafible) what could undisciplined men do, thos (allow them for argument fake) of superior number, against regular troops and artillery? And how could France afford them any affiftance, while we are masters of the sea, and his majesty's allies can pour into England what number of veteran troops should be required; if necessary, which it is evidently their interest to do; and is an obligation incumbent on them.
